

When solar radiation strikes glass, it is partly reflected, partly absorbed in the thickness of the glass and partly transmitted.

Solar radiant energy entering a room through the glass is absorbed by interior objects and surfaces, which then retransmit the energy as thermal radiation. This means that solar energy entering through the glass is trapped in the room, which then tends to heat up. During night, when exterior temperature drops, the stored heat tends to release from the mass/objects.